BECOME AN OAK REGENERATION SPECIALIST

You may not have noticed it yet, but our white oak stands are declining. Current conditions in Missouri's woods favor other trees making it harder for the next generation of white oak to take root. This is bad news for everyone in forestry. Many industries and livelihoods will be affected as oaks give way to less valuable species.

Luckily, there are things we can do to support good oak regeneration, especially during and after harvests. The Missouri Department of Conservation (MDC) is investing in getting the word out to foresters and loggers to get these practices on the ground. It is also conducting a campaign to alert landowners to this problem and encouraging them to work with foresters and loggers that are trained in oak regeneration practices.

MDC's campaign will create greater demand for forestry practices that benefit white oaks. You can qualify for offering these services by attending a short, free online training program. As an oak regeneration specialist, you will learn specific techniques for improving and regenerating white oak stands. You will also be able to advise your clients on oak-friendly practices to improve the long-term value of their woods.

This is a great opportunity to grow your business and keep it healthy in the future. Sign up for this free 2-hr course today. After you attend the training, MDC will be able to recommend your services to local landowners who are interested in oak regeneration.
